A year of posts. Still invisible.

Sakib Ahmed
Co-founder, Draper

Consistency is the floor.

Posting weekly gets you seen. Not remembered. Undeniable founders post with more gravity, not more volume. The floor is where most writers stop. That is also where they disappear.

Twelve topics. Zero recall.

Sales on Monday. Hiring on Wednesday. Fundraising on Friday. Twelve topics in a month and a reader cannot finish the sentence what you stand for. Pick one vein. Mine it for years.

Hedged opinions sound like nothing.

If your post could have been written by any other founder in your category, it already was. The bell that never rings is indistinguishable from the bell that was never hung.

Your voice is borrowed.

Most founders write like a 2019 LinkedIn guru. Generic cadence. Generic structure. Your voice should sound like you at a dinner table, not a webinar. If the reader cannot hear you in it, it is not yours.

Safe hooks are forgettable.

The opener that starts here is what I learned about leadership is an opt-out. The hook that works is the one that risks being wrong, the one a cautious founder would never write.

Commodity takes travel nowhere.

Reacting to yesterday news puts you in a lineup of ten thousand. The founder who had the take six months ago owns the conversation now. Late takes are luggage that never leaves the platform.

30 posts. 30 directions.

A founder who writes about something different every post is invisible by design. No throughline. No pattern. No recall. A weather vane points at everything and lands on nothing.

Narrow. Sharp. Repeated.

One topic you own. One stance sharper than anyone else. Twenty times a year, the same vein, the same voice. That is the pattern that makes a founder undeniable. Not content. Compounding.

Invisible is a choice. So is undeniable.

One call a week. Thirty minutes. That is it.

draperhq.com

Sakib Ahmed

Co-founder, Draper